Clemens, better known in England under his som de plume of "Mack Twais," has written an extremely humorous letter to the Spectator to complain of the treatment he has suffered at the hands of that enterprising pub isher, Mr. Hotten. Readers of "Mark Twain" 41 be aware that for some of "Mark Twain" will be aware that for some time past rival editions of his different works have been lesting from the rival houses of Routledge and Hotter; and of this it appears that the former is the only Euglish house that pays the author any copyright, while Mr. Hetten contents himself wish appropriating the products of Mr. Clemens's literary skrif without showing any particular sol citude as to the other side of the account. Of coarse this is perfectly legal, as there is no future national congright, and Mr. Clemens is only robbed in the ray that score of English and American authors have been already: but it is surely going a little too far when a publisher in the practice of his legalized piracy murders as well as the in his complications Mr. Hotten has thought roper to said to the genume productions of "Mark Twain" various articles which Mr. Clemens most earnestly repudiates, and some of which are presented
